Electronic Databases & Internet Resources

". . . Citations of electronic documents can follow the same general form as citations of printed materials. The same basic information is needed: author and title of the particular item; name and description of the source cited, . . . an online source; city of publication, if any; publisher or vendor (or both); date of publication or access (or both); and identifying numbers or pathway needed for access to the material. Citations of material previously issued in print should include the same information and use the same style as any references to books and periodicals, as well as providing the additional information necessary to locate the electronic version." (Turabian p. 158). When quoting text from an online article, cite a specific paragraph number rather than a page number when possible. For example, a quotation from paragraph 23 of a full-text article would be cited as (par. 23).
